

Gardens for Rent: Only a Space?

Garden center owners seek an unconventional way to expand their business.

By Neda Simeonova

Give me an S, give me an E, give me an L, give me an L...SELL! Reorganize your departments, improve customer service, add better labels and signage, and the list goes on — we've talked a lot in past issues about the importance of being creative and staying off the beaten path when it comes to ideas that could help make your business more successful. And as the competition between box stores and independents continues, what should you do to ensure your spot in the race?

After a couple of years of "the worst drought in the history of New York" followed by a very wet year, which nearly put him out of business, Matt Horn, owner of Matterhorn Nursery, Spring Valley, N.Y., found himself looking for a non traditional avenue to bring in additional income — get paid from the rental of his land.

THE HISTORY

Matterhorn Nursery spreads over 40 acres, 10 acres of which is dedicated to display gardens. Horn opened a retail store in 1996 after starting originally as a wholesale grower, shipping perennials and water plants throughout the Northwest. Today, Matterhorn Nursery features a complete horticultural center with one of the largest aquatic centers in the country, tree, shrub and annual areas along a major rose garden, alpine garden, hosta garden, a grass walk as well as many other garden plans still in the works. But the biggest project of all, currently in progress, is renting the gardens out for events such as weddings, corporate retreats, photo shoots, anniversaries, garden clubs and seminars.

Partly, Horn's inspiration came from Brian Minter, owner of Minter Gardens, Chilliwack, BC, Canada, who has been involved in the event business for several years. Minter's 30-acre show garden was initially involved mainly in the tourist business, "Visitors pay $12 (Canadian) admission to go through and experience the garden," Minter said. "We found that after 9/11 American tourists just didn't feel comfortable travelling so we went into the wedding business big time." Minter built two conservatories for scheduled ceremonies and complete wedding receptions. "It has been a savior because no matter what happens, people are still getting married," Minter explained.

Although following in Minters footsteps, Horn's plans are to avoid being fully involved in the event business. "I'd like to get paid for the rental of my land," he said. "Running an event place can be extremely profitable. We have 10 acres of gardens, and it takes up a lot of space and money to maintain. We have gardeners who maintain the garden and keep it really nice, so it is just a matter of having someone book the events and have a planner to deal with it. We're not going to be involved with things such as setting the tables and this and that; we are just renting the land."

THE DETAILS

Planing. Currently, Horn is still in the process of accomplishing his new goals. Last year he started off by hiring a locator, a company that schedules photo, magazine, book and catalog shoots, and has had some success with it. ♦

Top: Seating area and view from the Rose Garden Cottage at Matterhorn Nursery. Bottom: Perennial flower border alongside the Matterhorn Pond. (All photos courtesy of Matterhorn Nursery)

OFF-SEASON IDEAS

Because they are not allowed to cook on the premises, along with renting space, Horn offers a menu and catering service that he designed. "If we cater in, the caterer holds the liquor license," he explained. "It is basically as if I had an event planner, but instead, we are just getting paid for our land, and we want 10 percent of the catering; if they have a band, we want 10 percent of that as well."

Similar to Minter Gardens, Matterhorn Nursery is about to gate its gardens and plans to start charging garden visitors admission. "I am not hungry for money, but part of the problem is that people are using our nursery as a park, which means they come to visit and they leave and don't buy," Horn explained. "I need to pay my bills, and we are limited on parking, so when these guys came in and took our parking spaces, it hurt us." However, in order to prevent a drawback from the gating of the gardens, Horn said members of their preferred gardeners program will still be able to get in for free.

Minter agrees, believing the nemesis of garden stores is that they put a lot of effort into creating a positive experience for their customers and yet, don't get paid for it. "You have to charge for the experience, and it has to be a value for their time, not value for their money," Minter added. And Minter ensures his customers receive the experience they paid for. "Last year we put miniature trains that took people through the garden, we planted daffodils in the spring and then tulips followed by sunflowers in the summer and other things as well. So in other words, it's not just a train ride, it is what you experience on the train ride."

Challenges. Business plans often encounter many challenges, and both Minter and Horn agree that one of the first steps is the permit process. "It took us two years to get through the permit process," Horn said. "For us it was basically neighbors. We're located in a residential area, and people always want to know what we're doing." Even after two years there are still gray areas. According to Horn, "It's just been a fight. We can hold events, ◆

Top: A garden serpent topiary feature in the side garden pond at Matterhorn Nursery;
Bottom: A wedding at The Rose Garden Cottage.